The PATRIOT's PORTRAIT; occasioned by the Remarks on the Craftsman's Vindication, &c.

To the AUTHOR of the WEEKLY REGISTER.

SIR,

IT was a Custom in Athens of old, for every new Picture, or Statue, to be expos'd to the publick View, for general Criticism, and common Examination: The Craftsmen have in some Degree followed this Example; but, instead of the Figures of Gods, and Heroes, presented us with their own, and, in Exchange for our Approbation, were the Heralds of their own Applause: They themselves summ'd up the Evidence, determin'd the Likeness, and proportion'd the Value, anticipating our Opinions, and setting aside our Voices without Appeal.——However, there were Men of Spirit and Genius amongst us, who resented this arbitrary Invasion of the publick Privilege, and were resolv'd to do their Country, and them Justice; they rightly imagin'd that Vanity and Self-Love held the Glass to their Features; that Prejudice was the Pencil, and Sophistry prepar'd the Colours; they thought it incumbent on them to present the World with a new Copy, and leave all Mankind to judge of their Fidelity.——The Work is done, the REMARKS are made, and the true Portrait exposes the false.——But all Men are not qualified to distinguish the Difference; some are profess'd Admirers of the D'Anverian Stile, and avow'd Enemies to every other; some have not Capacity to judge for themselves, these take the Watch-Word from their Principals, and are only Echoes of Approbation; some are Humourists in Opinion, and vary their Conclusions with the Temper of their Bodies: My Countrymen in general are too apt to sympathize with their Climate, and are inconstant in political Painting to a Proverb.——'Tis for these Reasons only that I have prevail'd on myself to compare these opposite Portraits together, and appeal to the Hearts of Mankind to bear Witness to the superior Merit of the last.——Indeed, were Men faithful to themselves, there would be no Occasion for the Comparison; Truth discovers itself by its own Lustre, and we become wilfully blind to avoid the Conviction that is inseparable from it.——Neither is the Likeness only as visible as Truth itself, but every Stroke is masterly, the Taste is grand and noble, the Execution lively and natural, and the Colouring elegant and beautiful: Those who are Enemies to the Subject must be entertain'd with the Composition, those of a like Genius must admire the Spirit, the Flame, the divine Enthusiasm of the whole.——But we will not confine our Sentiments to general Encomiums, or general Censures; but, addressing ourselves to the People, proceed to a particular and faithful Examination of both, submitting all to the Review of Justice and Impartiality.——The first of the Craftsmen has drawn himself at large, as the first of Politicians, as the only Genius able to correct the Errors of the Administration, and zealous to expose them; as a Person of such Integrity as to forsake his Friends, and resign his Preferments, in Compliment to the Publick, and for the common Good of the People.——The severer, and juster Pencil, in the Remarks, has made the Disappointment of his Ambition, the Motive for his Desertion of his Friends; and the Resignation of his Places, his deep Resentment for being refus'd a higher Advancement: Hence he dates his profound Skill in Politicks, hence his Study of Popularity, his Hatred of Courts, and his Contempt of the Ministry.——Blessed Reformation! We see a Neglect among Statesmen may be as guilty of Corruption, as a Pension, and the Heart of a Patriot as deceitful as any one even in the Secrets of Government.——Observe, Gentlemen, how much the Likeness is mended already, and of what Advantage it is to correct the Vanity of one Man, by the Honesty of another.——The said Craftsman has painted himself as uniform in his Principles, tho' he changes his Acquaintance.——The Sun, says he, may seem in Motion to the Frailty of our Senses, but alas! 'tis the dull Earth that changes her Situation, and not he: In like Manner has he pourtray'd himself as the Center of Stability, and reflected Apostasy on his Opposers.——But the Remarks has alter'd this Feature most remarkably, and represented it in a quite different Manner; the Artist there has inform'd us, that this very resolute, and determin'd Patriot, has more than once abated of his Constancy, and given shrewd Hints that he was ready for a Change; but his old Friends, despising the Opportunity, suffer'd him to renew his Obstinacy, and rave as much to the Purpose, as he did before.——What think you my Countrymen? does not the last Draught improve in our Examination, and the first, like Spencer's false Florimel, in Company with the true one, melt, and dissolve before it?——Again, the said Craftsman has made no Scruple to draw himself in the Habit of a Roman Citizen, and has sketch'd out all the Roman Virtues, by Way of Decoration to the Piece; such as publick Spirit, Bravery, Zeal for Liberty, Love for the People, and Honesty superior to Corruption: We observe they were sketch'd for Decoration only, because the Remarks absolutely remov'd the Masque, when he began the Picture, and behold the Figures underneath it, were Hypocrisy, Vanity, Revenge, Avarice, and Ambition: These he has faithfully copied, and prov'd they were inseparable from the Original.——Now Britons ye are undeceiv'd; now you see the true Portrait of a Patriot, and, I presume will esteem it accordingly: This is what has been flatter'd so much, and has amus'd you so long.——But the Cheat is over, and the Deceptio Visus will take Place no more.——

Proceed we next to that other Craftsman who is likewise as much a Patriot as the last, and does him the Honour of being his inseparable Colleague.——This Gentleman, contrary to all Expectation, and, as we think, to all Prudence, has ventur'd to present the Publick with his Picture, and much Pains has he taken to make it worthy of its Regard: Whether he has succeeded, or no, the Remarks will very easily and naturally inform us.——Undoubtedly he has shewn great Art, and Judgment, in setting his Figure behind, and, as it were, in the Shade, allowing you only a distant View, and pleading unavoidable Misfortune, as an Excuse for the Want of natural Beauty.——But cruelly has the Author of the Remarks alter'd the Position in his Draught; brought his Likeness forward to the Eye, and thrown such a Blaze of Light upon him, that the Spectator starts at his Deformity, as a Libel upon Humane Nature.——Much has this modest Patriot labour'd to turn his Features to the best Advantage, and colour, with Artifice, those Parts that could not be justified; yet has he left some Lines and Traces of Ugliness, as they are in the Original, and those our Artist, in the Remarks, thought himself oblig'd to copy with all the Exactness imaginable.——Without Question, my Countrymen, you deem'd it greatly ridiculous to see a Man vain of his Character, when he had so much Reason to be asham'd of it; and endeavouring to make it appear beautiful, when the very Attempt expos'd him to the Aversion he was striving to avoid.——Surely there was much Infatuation in such a Proceeding, and this great Master in Political Painting has very justly drawn the national Odium on himself.——No Body could suspect that (whatever Excellency he would flatter himself with) he too would commence Patriot at last, and habit himself as a Roman Citizen; no Body would have accus'd him of so vain an Imagination; but agreeable to his Custom, he has really surpass'd our most sanguin Flights, and aspir'd to an Honour that covered him with Ignominy and Confusion.——Be so good, Gentlemen, as cast your Eyes on the Picture this Mistake has occasion'd, examine well the complicated Treacheries that are distinguish'd in every Lineament, and ask your selves if they are the Lineaments of Patriotism; if they are, the Abuse of the Name has revers'd the Meaning, and the Stile is just.——'Tis necessary now for us to ask Pardon of the great Master, who has corrected the Figures of these Political Brethren so well, for pretending to recommend his Performance, when 'tis not in our Power to give it an additional Credit, or make it any Compliment that is equal to its Merit.——But we hope our Zeal will be our Pardon, and, in that Presumption, take the Liberty to present this Miniature to the Publick in Honour of the Original.

An Essay on UNIVERSAL TASTE.

'TIS hard to determine whether there is an eternal Difference in the Essence of Souls, or whether they exert themselves more or less vigorously, in Proportion to the Delicacy of the Organs of the Body they inform; or whether the Force of Education, Habit, or Society, gives a superior Turn to the Genius that possesses these Advantages.

'Tis certain there is a wide Difference in Men, and, whatever is the Cause, some are distinguish'd by so many Perfections as almost elevate them above the Rank of their Fellow-Creatures, and set them at an awful Distance for the Vulgar of Mankind to wonder at.——But how great soever is the Capacity, infinite Toil and Labour are necessary to form it into Beauty, and Regularity; so many Difficulties are to be surmounted, so many Mortifications are to be endur'd, and such a Labyrinth of Knowledge is to be struggled thro', that, were not Ambition to prompt us, and Vanity to flatter, scarce one in a Thousand would have the Courage to undertake so arduous a Task, and not one in five Hundred of them, have the Resolution or Address to accomplish the End they had in View. The very Prospect would frighten us from attemptiug it; or Passion, or Indolence hinder our attaining it: But very few arrive even at the Point they propos'd. None can say they have finish'd their Journey; Knowledge is infinite, and, when Mortality has spun out its latest Thread in the Pursuit, we look forward with Astonishment at the unbounded Scene before us, and backward with Contempt at the little Portion our whole Lives could compass.——Nature seems to have done as much for us as we can do for ourselves, and the utmost of our Endeavours can be little more than to regulate, and polish the Hints that arise from her.——What is Learning but a Collection of that Knowledge which Nature had inspir'd? and what Politeness but a Refinement on those Pleasures which she has dictated?——Let us look upon the Grave and Serious among the Vulgar, and we shall see Oeconomy and Morality in Miniature, and both as perfect as is needful to their Circumstance. Let us observe the Frolick and Gay, and their Pleasures are the same as ours, and have the Decorings of Elegance as well: Has refin'd and modish Luxury a single Enjoyment that they don't admire, and imperfectly imitate?——Let us pursue this Thought a little farther, and we shall find our Poetry, Painting, Statuary, and Musick indulg'd among them; and, as in their Original, labouring for Perfection.——What gathers together the numerous Crowds that listen to a wretched Song in every Street? but the Rapture which Poetry never fails to inspire, and that Softness of Heart which engages the Attention and charms every Faculty.——Why are their Walls hung with scurvy Pictures? but because their Hearts delight in every Imitation of Nature, and whatever they are fond of they are willing to possess.——For Statuary they have Images of Wax, and Earth, and Clay, in abundance, made fine with Painting, and Gilding to atone for the Want of true Beauty, and real Excellency.——How many of them are so inchanted with Musick as to make it the Business of their Lives, and sometimes practise it with Success? All in general bear Witness to its Power, and, like Amphion's Stocks and Stones, are transported with Harmony.——Such is the mechanical Influence that the rudest Sketch of Beauty and Pleasure has upon the most low and uncultivated Minds, and so general is the Confession of all Mankind in their Favour.——I think I may be indulg'd too in recommending this Thought to Men of Education and Quality. I think such Studies, and such Employments would afford them more Satisfaction than the present Mode of Diversions, and would be far more worthy of their Characters.——Nature, 'tis plain, points them out to their Consideration, and their own Stations in Life should make them their inseparable Companions.——But instead of that, I speak it with great Concern, there are very few who have not strove to mortify their Relish for them, and done a Violence to Nature, in Compliment to Fashion.——Gaming and Horse-Races are now the Amusements in Vogue; and there are few who have Courage enough to declare against them, even tho' they are contrary to their Inclinations.——True Politeness seems in Disgrace with Mankind, and 'tis absurd to be its Advocate: Where is the Person who glories in being her Admirer, in stemming the Torient of Barbarism in an abandon'd Age, and doing Justice to Learning and Virtue? Where is the Guardian Genius to Merit, its Nurse, its Patron, its Friend, its Father? Where-ever he is, he is but one, and Numbers must pine for his Influence in vain. Mecænas is the Servant of his Country, as well as the Friend of Politeness, and must often sacrifice his private Character to his publick.—His Moments are divided between both, and, when he recedes from one, 'tis only to indulge the other: As Diomed says of Æneas in Virgil, were there but a few more such as He among the Great, and Noble, the Spirit of Learning would be reviv'd, and the Muses never weep in vain.

FOREIGN NEWS.

Arrived Mails.——Friday; one from Holland ——Sunday; thoſe from France and Flanders.——Tueſday; one from Holland.——Wedneſday; one from France.

BERLIN, May 4. Yeſterday about Four o'Clock in the Afternoon, the King having ordered his whole Court to rendezvous in the magnificent Apartments in the Caſtle, belonging to the late King, his Majeſty there de-clar'd the Marriage of the Princess Royal with the Hereditary Prince of Bareith; whereupon the Nuptial Rings were exchinged in Form. The Court was exceeding gay and numerous upon this Occasion; and the King entertained the Illustrious Company with a magnificent Supper, and a Ball which lasted all Night.

Hague, June 8. Mynheer Vander Meer, their High-Mightinesses Embassador at the Court of Spain, confirms the general Opinion, That the Guaranty of Gibraltar and Port-Mahon, contained in the General Guaranty, is the great Stumbling-Block to that Court's Approbation of the Treaty; the Prince of the Asturia's Party in the Council having laboured to persuade them, that all the Countries secured to Don Carlos in Italy are not of Half the Importance of those two Possessions, which the Crown of Spain is to guaranty to those who took them; than which, they said, nothing could appear more hard or unjust.

In a Cabinet-Council holden before the Departure of the last Courier from Seville, the Queen made an Effort to get the Act of Approbation signed, but was opposed by Patinho at the Head of the Prince's Party. Her Majesty refuted all his Arguments; but still he persisted in his over-bearing Discourses, till the Queen could endure it no longer, but flew into a Passion, called him an impertinent Scoundrel, and a Traitor, and told him she would shortly make him repent his Audaciousness. This Adventure shews plainly enough in what a Situation Affairs stand at that Court, and confirm what we have already observed, that the Queen's Carriage to the Count de Rottemburgh is nothing in the World but a Fetch of her Politicks; and that there is hardly any Room to doubt, but her Majesty will carry her Point, and get the Treaty of Vienna approved at Seville.
